

Year Ten Sculpture Main Lesson with Melchior Martin

There was a certain amount of irony involved in teaching a sculpture main lesson via the internet, communicating techniques and approaches to a three dimensional art form through a grainy and intermittent image on a two dimensional screen. In many ways it was an exercise in imagination, determination and faith, however as the sculptures that were completed at home are arriving at school I'm becoming aware of just how resourceful our students are. Some of this year's work is as ambitious and refined as any that I have seen over the years I have been taking this main lesson.

I would also like to thank the parents who put up with the inevitable mess created by a clay modelling project taking place in their lounge room! I hope no permanent damage was done!
